In Mumbai, the streets are filled with the sounds of crickets as thousands of women go through menopause. In a small village in Tamil Nadu, Arunachalam is a man who spends his days making sanitary napkins which he sells for a pittance. Despite his humble living and large family, he refuses to accept any help from anyone and does every job himself – from the grittiness of cutting up used cloth to creating new designs that shave off 15 minutes off each menstrual cycle. Arunachalam's daughter Radhika introduces him to the audience as an innovator whose problem-solving ability makes him an inspiration to his peers. Once Arunachalam's daughter suffers from an infection after stepping on a used sanitary napkin. He then makes a simple but effective sanitary napkin which is machine washable. He has to make 50,000 units of the sanitary napkins which he sells for only Rs 5 per unit. He is featured in Bollywood films, television shows, newspapers and magazines all over the world. The media outlets would interview him on his invention every month. After that, there were many people who wanted to use his product but the problem was that he had nothing that he could supply them with. He couldn't meet the need of everyone that wanted his product. He wants to produce more but he needs money to do so. He makes an amount for Rs 500,000 by selling his family's gold jewelry. This is all he has and implements an idea to use this money to make sanitary napkins. Arunachalam finds out that the raw materials for his sanitary napkin are much cheaper than what he expected, which leads him to buy more raw materials. He finds out the problem in the machine and finds a way around it. The process makes him realize that before now he never involved anyone in his struggles because no one knew about them, but now everyone knows about them because of his product. He finds out that the raw materials have been purchased from a company which is called "Happy Elements". He travels a lot and visits a lot of buildings and offices until he finds the right office. He sees a woman in a pink jacket and immediately goes to her. He visits that building for many days, until finally seeing the woman again. The woman doesn't know how this man found her but she tells him that she is the owner of "Happy Elements", she is Gayatri Joshi (Sonam Kapoor) and he has been looking for her for two months. She also tells him that it was his product which led her to make sanitary napkins for women in villages throughout India.
